The Feast is a further development of my hand cycle. A model carrying an intense rage within, a moment in which something is born at the same time. Rage stores itself in the body, in the jaw, in tensions that wait there.

As art historical references have run through my work for years, I turned three portraits — Caravaggio, Van Dyck, Delacroix — frontal, opened their mouths, not as a formal decision but as a physical necessity. The hands pushed forward, the distortion as statement. The dead flesh I brought to the foreground, embedded in hard chiaroscuro, wrapped in the suggested turquoise of garbage bags.

The early Baroque was the moment the gesture stopped being ideal and was caught by the weight of flesh. The tattoos translate this ornament into the present. The Romantics picked that up again — a time of resistance, reinvention, but also of looking back.

Because this rage, that goes through marrow and bone, that sits in the flesh and goes into the flesh, it penetrates, demanded a form. This one.
